This 'Herd mentality' impacts not only the investors, who do not have the educational background or interest, but even many educated people who get impacted from the one-way wave.

Herding is sensible rule of thumb behaviour in everyday life. But this bias can prove costly to investors. One should focus on asset allocation to suit one's situation and stick to it during good and bad times, and this is the right way to manage this bias, say financial experts.

"The only way of not getting carried away is to understand the 'Why' 'What' and 'When' of Investing. Why: For what purpose you are investing. What: the product you are investing is in line with your objective and risk appetite. For When: What is the time after which you require this corpus?" explains financial expert Nishant Kohli.

This 'Why' 'What' and 'When' will give investors clarity on making their investment decisions.

Even after investing in a good scheme, investors tend to make many common mistakes.

Mudra Portfolio Managers Founder, Director and Business Head-Wealth, Nishant Kohli, says there are three mistakes that can impact the overall financial health of the investor:

- Goal Identification and Goal-based Investments: Most people just invest because they have surplus money. They don't have any objective from investments and thus they keep on making common mistakes like choosing wrong products, trading frequently, investment skewed towards one investment style, following herd mentality, withdrawing from corpus at regular intervals. Investing without objectives is like playing football without a goal post. Deciding on the objective gives direction to one's investments.

- Don't count your eggs daily: Wealth creation is a marathon and not a sprint. So it's very important to ensure that you are not looking at your returns on a daily basis, it'll be like uprooting a plant daily to see how far the roots have reached, and it'll not create anything. Give it time and let it grow.

Investors tend to over diversify when investing in mutual funds. “If investors add more funds, they do not add any value. Three to five equity funds are more than enough to take care of portfolio diversification. Over allocation to equity in a bull market and under allocation to equity in a bear market are the most common mistakes of investors. The rational thing to do is the reverse of this,” says investment expert at FinIntellect Satheesh Kannan.

If investors have knowledge, skill set, they can weigh the pros and cons judiciously and take a logical approach. However, if not then investors should definitely take the advice of financial managers.

“The role of an manager is not or should not be limited to scheme selection, financial manager plays a crucial role as on the one hand he/she helps you identify the objectives for investments, on the other, they also ensure that you are doing periodic reviews and are not deviating from your course,” says Kohli.

When should investors redeem investments?

Often, investors tend to take bad decision while redeeming their investments. They redeem when funds are under-performing, fearing there may be further falls. Kannan says redeem once your goals are aligned with the investment plan, redeem gradually over a period of 2-3 years.

Investors make mistake following the fear and greed in the market. They make impulsive decision to redeem and they redeem without a plan of action for the money and ignore the taxation and exit load aspects.

Kohli explains that the ultimate aim or 'why' of every investment is to reach your financial goals successfully, redeeming an investment should primarily happen once you have attained your demarcated goals.

However, early redemption is justified only due to personal factors like emergencies, financial instability and factors such as scheme under performance, portfolio reallocation, and change in risk profile and shift in asset allocation. However, the function of redemption is to reinvest back, adds Kohli.
